Introducing DealBook Dialogue
The New York Times: DealBook
By Andrew Ross Sorkin
October 2, 2009

Andrew Ross Sorkin and the DealBook staff invite readers to DealBook Dialogue, our first online round table. The topic is “Too Soon to Rethink? Assessing the Financial Crisis,” and the discussion will be moderated by the Deal Professor, Steven M. Davidoff.

Regulators are seeking to restructure our capital markets in a manner unprecedented since the Great Depression. This new regulation would be based on a conventional wisdom that the current financial crisis was set off by the collapse of housing, credit and commodities bubbles. It is presumed that these bubbles themselves were caused by, among other things, deregulation, excessive risk-taking, trade and savings imbalances, inordinate compensation incentives, social decay and the use of derivatives. But is it all, or even any part of it, true?

We at DealBook want to challenge or confirm the emerging consensus about the financial crisis. To bring together 12 top academics, market participants and regulators with Professor Davidoff to write something original that really makes us think. To inform the public at this critical time in our history about where things are, how they got this way and where we, as a country, should go.

Beginning Monday, we will have a weeklong round table discussing this topic. The participants will post articles to DealBook throughout the week. They will also be posting responses to the articles of other participants and to commentators. We invite you to join with your own comments.

The round table will conclude on Oct. 12 or 13 with any remaining responses and a round-table wrap-up by Professor Davidoff.
