At issue The Red Sox sale

Despite what the critics say, it wasn’t a bad job

The Red Sox sale has been billed as a win-win-win situation, perhaps any other sports franchise in America. Only one complainer that managed to score (slightly) was the Herald Tribune, that John Henry’s cash injection into the club is the best thing that’s happened to the team since the Red Sox won the World Series in 1912.

The Herald had been highly critical of the Henry group and the move to Fenway Park. While the team has been competitive in recent years, the Herald has been critical of the team’s management, its ability to sign top free agents and its overall performance.

The Herald’s stance on the sale was unique in that it recognized the deal as a win-win situation. The team was expected to be more competitive in the future, and the Herald believed the move to Fenway Park was a positive step.

For those reasons, the Herald liked the deal, and for that reason, it was a win-win situation. The Herald also noted that the team’s management had made some changes, and while those changes were not enough to win the team a World Series, they were still positive steps forward.

So, while the Herald’s coverage of the sale was unique, it was not the only publication that liked the deal. Many other publications, both in and out of Boston, were also positive about the move to Fenway Park and the injection of cash into the team.

The Herald’s coverage of the sale was not without its detractors, however. Some felt that the Herald was being too soft on the Henry group, and that the team was still not competitive enough. Others felt that the Herald’s coverage was too positive, and that the team was still not doing enough to compete at the highest level.

Regardless of the criticism, the Herald’s coverage of the Red Sox sale was unique, and it was a win-win situation for the team.
